Bloodborne Pathogens Self Study Video
On December 6, 1991, the Occupational Safety and Health administration (OSHA) published their standard for occupational exposure to bloodborne pathogens in the Federal Register. A component of this standard requires the employer to provide annual education regarding the occupational hazard of bloodborne pathogens. It is important to remember that OSHA standards are federal law and compliance is mandatory. However, it is more important to recognize that this standard was established to help protect the healthcare worker from the serious workplace hazard of bloodborne pathogens.
